

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION

in support of Nataliia Fursenko and her professional contribution to LegalPilot

Dear Sir or Madam:

I, Irina M. Sidorova, am a practicing lawyer, admitted to Paris bar and Nice bar, France under registration number 06645858, and I provide legal services in the fields of commercial and civil law, real estate law, tax law, immigration, and other areas of French law.

I became acquainted with Nataliia Fursenko, PhD in Law, and the LegalPilot platform she founded in a professional context, after clients began contacting me for legal consultations following their prior use of the platform to obtain preliminary legal information and identify matters requiring individual professional assessment.

This circumstance gave me an opportunity to evaluate LegalPilot not merely as an informational resource, but through its practical effect on the interaction between a client and a legal professional. During consultations, I observed that clients who had used LegalPilot were generally better prepared to explain the relevant facts, identify the principal issues requiring legal analysis, formulate the purpose of the consultation, and provide documents connected with the matter under review.

That level of preparation allowed the consultation to move more efficiently from the initial collection of information to the legal qualification of facts, identification of applicable rules, and consideration of appropriate legal options. Based on this direct professional experience, I subsequently reviewed the structure and concept of LegalPilot in greater detail, including the approach used by Nataliia Fursenko to organise legal information for users.

In my professional opinion, an important feature of LegalPilot is that it does not simply present isolated legal materials or general explanations. The platform is structured around the user's legal situation and the relationship among the circumstances that may affect that situation. It is designed to assist a person in understanding which facts may be legally relevant, which documents may require attention, and which issues should be addressed with a qualified legal professional.

This approach has practical significance because clients frequently encounter difficulty not only in finding legal information, but also in determining how different legal and administrative matters relate to one another. A person without legal training may have access to numerous sources and still be unable to identify the correct sequence of actions, distinguish material facts from secondary information, or determine when professional legal advice is necessary.

LegalPilot addresses this preliminary stage by helping users organise their circumstances before seeking individual legal advice. In my experience, this can improve the quality of communication between client and lawyer because the client is better able to present relevant information in a structured manner and the lawyer can devote more of the consultation to substantive legal analysis.

I consider it particularly important that LegalPilot does not purport to replace the work of a lawyer or substitute automated information for an individual legal opinion. Its value lies in preliminary legal orientation and in preparing the user for a professional consultation. This distinction is, in my view, both legally appropriate and professionally responsible.

Based on my review of the project, Nataliia Fursenko has played a defining role in the creation of the LegalPilot concept, its legal structure, and the logic by which information is organised and presented. Her contribution extends beyond the compilation or restatement of legal rules. It consists in developing a systematic method for translating complex legal and administrative issues into a coherent framework that can assist users in understanding their situation and preparing for professional legal assistance.

In my assessment, this represents an independent professional and intellectual contribution in the field of digital legal navigation. The project combines legal expertise, structured analysis, and digital tools in a manner that is capable of improving access to understandable legal orientation while preserving the essential role of individual legal assessment.

My opinion is also informed by the practical results I have personally observed. Clients who contacted me after using LegalPilot demonstrated a clearer understanding of the subject of their consultation, were better prepared to discuss the relevant circumstances, and were generally more focused in the presentation of their questions and supporting information. This made the consultation process more efficient and enabled greater attention to be given to legal analysis and the selection of an appropriate course of action.

For a practising lawyer, this is a meaningful practical effect. Effective legal representation depends on accurate facts, relevant documentation, and a clear understanding of the client's objective. A system that helps a client prepare these elements before the consultation can contribute to more focused and productive professional interaction.

I also consider the broader professional significance of Nataliia Fursenko's work to lie in the development of a model that can be applied to situations involving international mobility, legal adaptation, and complex administrative procedures. The increasing use of digital tools in legal services makes it especially important to develop models that improve accessibility without blurring the distinction between general legal orientation and personalised legal advice. LegalPilot reflects this distinction in a manner that I consider professionally sound.

On the basis of my direct professional experience with clients who contacted me after using LegalPilot, together with my subsequent review of the project's concept and structure, I regard Nataliia Fursenko's contribution as substantive, independent, and practically relevant.

In my professional opinion, LegalPilot is a meaningful author-developed initiative in the field of digital legal navigation, and Nataliia Fursenko is a highly qualified legal professional whose work demonstrates the ability to combine legal expertise, systematic analysis, and modern digital solutions in a practical format.

I support her continued professional activity and the further development of LegalPilot. If required, I am prepared to provide additional clarification regarding my professional assessment and the circumstances known to me personally, subject to the applicable duties of professional confidentiality.

Respectfully,
