Dear Nataliia Fursenko,

The Editorial Board of the academic peer-reviewed open access journal Academic Visions would like to express our sincere gratitude for your review of the manuscript "Some Aspects of Training Future Lawyers to Ensuring Productive Socialization of Migrants and Refugees", published in Issue No. 49 (2025), Education/Pedagogy section.

Your review showed strong professional expertise and a deep understanding of the issues situated at the intersection of higher education pedagogy and migration law – a complex interdisciplinary field that requires both subject-matter competence and analytical sensitivity to the broader social and humanitarian context in which contemporary legal education operates. We particularly value the thoroughness with which you examined both the theoretical foundations and the practical-applied dimensions of the study, providing the authors with a comprehensive and well-structured assessment that addressed the article from multiple analytical perspectives – from the soundness of its conceptual framework and the consistency of its methodological approach to the relevance of the proposed practice-oriented forms of training and the formation of professional and personal qualities of future lawyers.

Your ability to identify the research's core scholarly contribution while offering a balanced, constructive evaluation of its limitations reflects the kind of rigorous yet fair-minded peer review essential to the integrity of academic publishing. The attention you devoted to assessing the article's structure, the quality and consistency of its regulatory and source base, the coherence of the argumentation, and the overall compliance with the journal's standards contributed significantly to the refinement of the final publication. Your recommendations regarding the strengthening of the methodological framework and the deepening of the psychological dimension of lawyer training were particularly valuable and reflect a clear understanding of the directions in which contemporary legal education is developing.

We highly appreciate your dedication to the peer review process and the considerable time and intellectual effort you invested in producing a review of such depth and quality. Your professional engagement strengthens the scholarly standards of our journal and supports research at the intersection of legal education, migration studies, and the social integration of vulnerable groups.

We look forward to our continued fruitful collaboration.
